How did the Fund perform during the reporting period?

Market forecasts remain challenging amid uncertainty from the new presidential administration, ongoing conflicts, elevated interest rates, and trade disputes. However, over the next 12-18 months, we believe the key market drivers will be the magnitude and direction of interest rate changes, the ensuing effect on cap rates, and the gap between public and private real estate valuations. With expected inflation ~3% and Fed Fund Futures pricing in a 50-basis-point cut for 2025, the current rate-cutting cycle appears complete, barring a recession or significant changes in the employment picture, and means further cuts are unlikely. We anticipate cap rates in the 5–6% range (assuming a 10-year treasury yield near 4.5%) and a narrowing public-private real estate valuation gap -- both supportive of our view of fair that REITs are fairly priced.

The portfolio focuses on high-quality real estate sectors with secular growth in same-store net operating income, cash flow, and dividends. We avoid sectors facing significant structural headwinds, with the portfolio deviating roughly 60–70% from the Dow Jones US Real Estate Index. In a high-interest-rate environment that limits multiple expansion, earnings growth remains the most reliable path to value appreciation, underpinned by companies with robust business models that drive sustained occupancy and rental increases over the long term.
